The public, we suppose, will not soon understand the late movements that ended in a conference in Hampton roads. The reports published are so unsatisfactory and so unimpressive, after what has transpired, and we can well imagine.

Blair went to Richmond, returned to Washington, and went back to Richmond. The result was the appointment of commissioners by Jeff. Davis to talk with Mr. Lincoln, and see if this bloody drama could not be stopped.

What did Davis say to Blair, and what did Blair say to Davis? What did Blair say to other people in Richmond, and what did they say to him? He did not tell them that anything less than a restoration of the Union would secure peace. They did not indicate to him that nothing less than a recognition of the Southern Confederacy would be listened to.

He must have had hopes from what he saw and read that the two parties were moving toward a compromise, and that the two parties were moving toward a compromise.

This generation is not likely to know how a conference came about between parties upon a well-defined issue understood by all, unless they were so to believe or both would yield something. According to the published accounts, Abraham Lincoln yielded nothing at all.

By the laws of the United States every rebel property is to be confiscated, and he is to be imprisoned and hung. They must submit to all the laws of the United States, and this law is one of them. The President only makes an idle promise to be liberal. He will not hang anybody, but, perhaps, may hang these commissioners. Perhaps some day four hours' conference, but it is not given to the world. Acknowledge the authority of the laws of the United States and the rebels are to expect the vengeance of the law or mercy at the discretion of the Executive.

They knew as much before the conference, and they have gone home no wiser than they were before. Upon the return of these commissioners, there was a new outbreak of fury in the war journals. They taunt those who talked of Union. You see, they say, you can't have Union, except as criminals, with the loss of all property, liberty and life, and the loss of all property, liberty and life, and the loss of all property, liberty and life.

We see that the New York Tribune takes a different view of this matter. The writer thinks that Southern people will see that they have no such treatment to fear; that all they have to do is to obey the law and suffer none of the evils that the leaders point out. Perhaps the writer may know something outside of the record; for certainly there is nothing in it to disabuse the minds of people South of an impression which this writer thinks is false.

Whoever reads the record will find that the writer who has been so confident about it, is something unaccountable about it. The parties might tell whether they were willing to do what they will not do. They have let out privately what they will not state publicly. One waits for what he thinks, himself, and what he has said to private friends. There are parties and factions at home which it is dangerous to provoke or offend, and these civilians can only feel their way. The ultra at Washington and Richmond were both suspicious of this movement and indignant. What a storm of vengeance they would have raised if either side had conceded anything at all.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune set down in a state of spasmodic ecstasy to describe and embellish a great event that happened at Washington. Senator Sumner walked into the old Senate chamber leading an American citizen of African descent, of the pure blood. The judges appeared in their gowns; Chief Justice. All bowed and smiled, and looked grand. Sumner moved the Court that the African gentleman be seated, a member of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, he is admitted to the bar in that Court.

Chase, like Jupiter on Mount Olympus, nodded, and the deed was done. The writer feels that he can do justice to the sublime spectacle of a pig in the parlor. He makes several efforts to raise his rhetoric up to the sublime. On the occasion and his "feelings" are too much for him, and he founders about in commonplace party rhapsody.

Well, let this contribution of Massachusetts to the Supreme Court be duly credited. She got a splash of American citizenship of African descent from Savannah, intending to fill up her quota of soldiers with them. The Senate has stopped the operation. Let Massachusetts, instead of making soldiers of these citizens, make soldiers of the Supreme Court and Congressmen of them. We think that would be a decided improvement. They would do better there than in the army.

These are progressive times. The negro has not advanced much that we know of, but the white man has fallen sadly back; and now that he is demonstrating his incapacity for self government, he need not take on airs much about the negro. This event shows, however, the design of the dominant party. It is not only the freedom of the negro, but his equality, that is to be recognized, and this amendment of the Constitution provides virtually to put the negro in the States out of the power of the States, and under the special care of the Federal Government. The negro is to be under no disabilities, political, civil or social. Let it be recollected, however, that the negro is not responsible for this. He is only a victim. Let the white man's folly.

We have before us at present anything but a promising aspect for the future. We are, what, a few days since, we were willing to believe was in a fair way for conclusion, seems now fast to be prolonged indefinitely. The end is far ther off, as far as the probabilities of reunion are concerned, than it was when the fatal gun was fired at Fort Sumter. Then it was known that many in the South earnestly opposed the rebellion; then it was known that President Lincoln and Congress were willing to concede almost anything to induce the States to return. The people, too, sympathizing with the just claims of the Southern States for their rights, and conscious that there was some cause for them to be apprehensive of injuries from the dominant party, were disposed to believe them and to grant every guarantee which the South deemed necessary to security, on the one condition of Union. Unfortunately then, as now, it was out of their power to do so. The matter was in the hands of those who were unwilling to be liberal. They succeeded in defeating the Crittenden compromise and all other favorable measures. So now Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward have succeeded in defeating all prospects of peace.

It has been said, to justify them for this cruel act, that they were compelled to it by the insistent commissioners; that the latter would consent to no terms of peace, except upon the basis of separation. Unfortunately for this assumption, the response of Mr. Lincoln does not sustain it. All that he says on the subject is, that "while by the other party—i. e. the rebel commissioners—it was not said that in any event or on any conditions they would consent to reunion, yet they equally would not declare that they would not consent." That is, they neither offered voluntarily to come back into the Union nor refused, but what General Grant says is still more explicit. In his letter to the President urging him to receive the Commissioners, he says:

Now that the interview between Major Eckert, under his written instructions, and Mr. Stephens and Hunter, has taken place, and that the result is not a matter of record, but not officially a matter of record, that I am convinced, upon conversation with Messrs. Stephens and Hunter, that their intentions are good, and that they are desirous of peace and Union. I have not felt myself at liberty to express every view of the President's policy, but I have not felt myself at liberty to express every view of the President's policy, but I have not felt myself at liberty to express every view of the President's policy.

One can be but struck in this matter with the anxious, sensible effort of the soldier to promote peace, as contrasted with the stubbornness of the civilian President and Secretary. The President takes occasion to send two dispatches to the Lieut. General, urging him in no event to cease hostilities. Indeed, so persistent is this that it becomes an irritating to the officer addressed, and discreditable to the President.

We can assume, then, upon this evidence that these commissioners were disposed to return to the Union conditionally. This brings us to the conditions, and we no longer wonder at their refusal to accept the terms offered. Mr. Lincoln states them:

First, The restoration of the national authority throughout all the States.

Second, No receiving by the Executive of United States on the slavery question, from a rebel or from a rebel, in the late war, and no message to Congress, and in the preceding documents; and Third, No cessation of hostilities till the rebel army is completely disbanded and all the forces hostile to the government.

It was further added that the recent amendment, by which the regulation of the relation of the blacks and whites was to be taken from a Congress, and placed in the hands of the Executive, was to be maintained.

Another concluding portion, if we can rely upon the Southern report transmitted to Davis, is that President Lincoln not only refused to receive the rebels back into the Union through their Confederate Government, but actually went to the extent of refusing to receive them through their States. That is, if Georgia, through the conciliatory but firm policy of Sherman, was induced to receive as formerly—as she seemed—then her admission would be refused. We have no reason to doubt that the President's action of Congress is a condemnation of it. With such terms, knowing the character, resolution and ability of the Southern commissioners, no one can be surprised at the refusal to accept them, and the result is a long war.

This is very unpromising, indeed; but our troubles do not cease here. We find that the radicals, not satisfied with the present difficulties and complications, have, to increase their, resolved on abolition, and further, to take into their hands the regulation of the relation between the blacks and whites in the States. It needs no great foresight to see to what troubles and disasters this will lead. Add to it a quarterly draft for from three to five hundred thousand men, and the future looks dark indeed.

There is a bill before the Legislature to incorporate a company to extend the improvements of the Kentucky river. An act was passed in 1855 for the purpose, but did not take effect. A report, made by Mr. George W. Stealey, Engineer to the Kentucky River Navigation Company, will be before the Legislature, setting forth the value and necessity of this work. Locks and dams have been placed on the river, so that it is no longer navigable to the mouth. The additional work is needed to realize a profit on what is done. There is a large extent of the State that would be benefited by this work that has yet received little from public improvements in the Commonwealth.

There is a gentleman in Wheeling who has for some time past been speculating in oil lands, who has realized so much money that he does not know what to do with it. He has kept the money in the State of Ohio, and he has not yet invested it in lands in Western Virginia, the prices were so rapidly increasing that he would be compelled to sell the lands to prevent a good bargain and speculation lost. He started with five hundred dollars capital two years ago, and is now worth over half a million.

FOUR PERSONS CARRIED INTO LAKE ONTARIO AND LOST.—A man named Love, his wife and child, were carried into Lake Ontario on a small boat from Niagara on Friday night last, were carried into the lake by ice, and either frozen to death or drowned. The bodies have not yet been recovered. Love had crossed from Youngstown, and insisted upon returning, contrary to the advice of the ferryman on the river.

FATAL EXPLOSION.—An explosion in a pyrotechnic manufactory in Weymouth, Massachusetts, on Thursday, killed three young women and injured another badly.

Peter Burn, a government employee, stole a bag of coffee at Chattanooga some time ago. Peter has been sent north of the Ohio river, where office is more plentiful.
